Subject: UM Students are eating bread to end hunger

Hi Jackie,

I've noticed your stories in the Miami Hurricane about student organizations raising money and awareness for good causes, particularly your story about Relay for Life last spring. Given your interest community service, you might be interested in a unique Halloween event where students' candy-filled challah bread creations will fight hunger in the Miami area.

On October 27, the University of Miami chapter of Challah for Hunger is throwing the first ever "Challoween," and inviting all University of Miami students to participate. Attendees create their own challah bread filled with their favorite Halloween candy while watching scary movies.

Tickets for the event cost $5, and the money raised is donated to the Jewish Community Services of South Florida's Kosher Food Bank. It is the only food bank in Miami that follows kosher dietary laws, and is where local Jewish households turn when they fall on hard times.

I can provide you with two tickets to the event, photography access and arrange for you to speak with the event's organizer.

Challah for Hunger raises funds and awareness for JCS of South Florida's Kosher Food Bank year-round by selling fresh challah bread baked by students each week on campus.

In addition, Challah for Hunger creates friendships and educates Jewish and non-Jewish students about Jewish culture. I can provide interviews with several student members of Challah for Hunger who have found a community on campus through the organization.

The event is held in the University of Miami's Shalala Student Center Activities Room, 1330 Miller Dr., room 2031.
